JOHN KNOWLES PAINE
Symphony No. 2 in A, Op. 34 (Im Frühling)

The premieres of John Knowles Paine's two symphonies—the First in 1876, the Second in 1880—may be said to mark the effective beginning of the American symphonic tradition. Nearly a half century later, another distinguished American composer, George W. Chadwick, who had been a young man in Boston in the 1870s, recalled that the Paine symphonies were "a stimulus and an inspiration to more than one ambitious musician of that time."

Paine (1839-1906) studied with a German immigrant musician in Portland, Maine, then went to Berlin for several years. (Fuller biographical details can be found on the New World recording of Paine's Mass in D, New World 80262.) Upon returning to the United States, he settled in Boston, where his Mass in D persuaded many that here was a significant new voice. In 1873 he was named assistant professor of music at Harvard. The rest of his career combined composition with teaching.

Immediately after his Harvard appointment, Paine entered a particularly prolific period, turning out in quick succession the Symphony No. 1 and the Violin Sonata (1875), an Overture to As You Like It and a Symphonic Poem on The Tempest (1876), the Duo Concertante for violin, cello, and orchestra (1877), the Symphony No. 2 (1879), and a complete incidental score for orchestra and male chorus to Oedipus tyrannus in the original Greek (1880-81). He spent a large part of the last two decades of his life completing the opera Azara, which he was never to hear.

During this time, he was a distinguished teacher as well; the roster of his pupils includes composers John Alden Carpenter, Frederick S. Converse, Arthur Foote, Edward Burlingame Hill, and Daniel Gregory Mason.

Following the enthusiastic reception of his First Symphony in 1876, Paine began work on his Second. The eagerly awaited work was performed by two different Boston orchestras on consecutive days. The Boston Philharmonic played it under Bernard Listemann at Sanders Theater, in Cambridge, on Wednesday evening, March 10, 1880. The next afternoon the Harvard Musical Association, Carl Zerrahn conducting, performed it at the Music Hall, downtown.

Since both ensembles were essentially pick-up orchestras (not until the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year later did Boston have a permanent orchestra of stable membership), the performances were no doubt rather rough-and-ready. Yet from the first the symphony evoked expressions of nationalistic pride and fervor. At the premiere in Cambridge, according to Richard Aldrich,

…ladies waved handkerchiefs, men shouted in approbation, and the highly respected John S. Dwight, arbiter in Boston of criticism, if not of manners, stood in his seat frantically opening and shutting his umbrella as an expression of uncontrollable enthusiasm.

The Gazette called Paine's symphony "by far the finest work hitherto written on American soil by an American composer." The length of the work, though—nearly fifty minutes, a good deal longer than Paine's First—proved a stumbling block to audiences who still regarded sitting through a Brahms symphony as an intellectual exercise, not a musical pleasure. Moreover, the symphony grows from several motifs developed in an almost Wagnerian manner and includes thematic cross-references between movements which benefit from repeated hearings to achieve their maximum effectiveness. Still, the critics found the expressive sense of the symphony as a whole clear from the outset.

The work's success induced the music publisher Arthur P. Schmidt to propose printing the score, provided enough copies were subscribed in advance to guarantee his costs. The subscription requirements were easily met, and Paine's Second Symphony became the first American symphonic work to be published in full score.

Critics of the time debated whether the symphony leaned dangerously toward the radical tone poems of Liszt. Though Paine certainly had programmatic ideas in planning his symphony, he downplayed them in early performances. The printed score provides no verbal clue as to the expressive aim of each movement. But a contemporary analysis by A.J. Goodrich (in Complete Musical Analysis, 1889) presumably used information from the composer in providing the following titles:

III. Adagio. "A Romance of Springtime."

The first movement's introduction, in A minor, is built on a pregnant motif stated at the outset in the lower strings. This "winter" theme recurs throughout the movement and underlies motifs of similar shape throughout the work. After a fortissimo outburst of the full orchestra, the violins introduce a rapid turn figure over a restatement of the "winter" theme. At first this seems purely decorative, but in fact it anticipates the "thawing" of winter into spring, which occurs when the first violins, unaccompanied, take up the four-note figure (E D B D) in half-notes, then quarter notes, then eighths, then sixteenths--a simple but remarkably effective suggestion of the wintry world melting at the coming of spring.

A new theme, in A major, introduces the lengthy sonata movement that follows. The "winter" theme and the main theme of the Allegro are developed sometimes together in counterpoint, at other times in new separate treatments. Moreover, the sixteenth-note ostinato that ushered in the spring hovers in the background, a hint of burgeoning new life. The coda combines all of the themes in a remarkable blend of technique and expressiveness.

The second movement is a vigorous Scherzo in D minor, filled with a jocular, rough humor, mysterious harmonies, and elfin games in the woodwinds, while the contrasting middle section in the major mode suspends the lyricism of the woodwinds over the darker, measured tremolo in the strings.

The Adagio is a passionate outpouring of lyricism, a rather Schumannesque movement in F major. Each return of the main theme is more elaborately and lushly scored, until a sudden collapse into a hushed reverie brings the coda, with its understated combination of themes heard against the soft reiteration of a horn call, like echoes from the depths of the woods.
Paine's finale erupts splendidly with joyous energy. A figure heard in the lower strings, leaping upward with a trill, recalls the chill of the first movement's "winter" theme, now joyously turned to spring. Other versions of that figure appear in new guises, sometimes turned upside down, sometimes with echoes of the Scherzo's first theme. The overflowing abundance culminates in a broad, lyric, hymn-like phrase. All of these elements enter into the elaborate development except the hymn, which returns in the recapitulation and, even more majestically, in the coda, as the climax of the entire symphony.

Why has such a rich work come to be so neglected? Since much of American concert life from the nineteenth century and well into this one was in the hands of German-born and German-trained musicians, it was only natural that their tastes should have colored the character of the music performed and composed, such as Paine's. Then, ironically, after World War I and the appearance of a new generation of composers, led by Aaron Copland, the rules of the game changed. It suddenly became important to sound "American"; anything redolent of German tradition was simply tossed out. In the process, we lost sight of an entire generation of talented composers and, quite literally, hundreds of compositions. But happily, we are now beginning to appreciate our predecessors for their very real virtues—for the strength and energy and imagination of music that we had simply dismissed without a hearing for decades.

—Steven Ledbetter

Steven Ledbetter is musicologist and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His research interests include the music of the second New England school.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

See also Selected Bibliography and Discography, New World 80262.

SELECTED DISCOGRAPHY

Zubin Mehta assumed the post of music director of the New York Philharmonic in the 1978-79 season. With his 1983 contract renewal he became the longest-tenured music director in the orchestra's history. Concurrently he is music director for life of the Israel Philharmonic. Mehta was born in Bombay, India, in 1936, the son of the Bombay Symphony's founder. At sixteen he began studies at Vienna's Academy of Music; he made his conducting debut in Vienna at the age of twenty-five. From 1961 to 1967 he was music director of the Montreal Symphony, and in 1962 he became music director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic. He conducts leading opera companies and orchestras throughout the world. His recordings are on the Columbia, London, Deutsche Grammophon, RCA, Angel, and New World labels.

The New York Philharmonic, founded in 1842, is the oldest symphony orchestra in the United States and one of the oldest in the world. Among its celebrated conductors have been Gustav Mahler, Arturo Toscanini, Artur Rodzinski, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Leonard Bernstein, and Pierre Boulez. The Philharmonic has made hundreds of recordings; the first was for Columbia in 1917. Recordings of the New York Philharmonic are found on the Columbia, London, Deutsche Grammophon, RCA, and New World labels.

John Knowles Paine:
Symphony No. 2 in A, Op. 34
(Im Frühling)
1- I. Introduction: Adagio sostenuto; Allegro ma non troppo (15:30)
2- II. Scherzo: Allegro (10:04)
3- III. Adagio (14:17)
4- IV. Allegro gioioso (10:35)

New York Philharmonic
Zubin Mehta, Conductor

Producer: Elizabeth Ostrow
Recording engineer: Jack Renner
Technical support by Edward Abbott, Soundmirror, Inc.
Recorded at the Manhattan Center, New York December 8, 1986
Recorded on Sony PCM 1610
Console: Studer
Microphones: Sennheiser, Sanken
Amplifier: Threshold
Monitors: B&W
Digital editing and compact disc mastering:
E. Amelia Rogers, Soundmirror, Inc.
Cover design: Bob Defrin

Special thanks to Sam Dennison of the Edwin A. Fleisher Collection of the Free Library of Philadelphia for providing scores for this recording.

This recording was made possible with grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, the New York State Council on the Arts, and Francis Goelet.

FOR NEW WORLD RECORDS:
Herman E. Krawitz, President; Paul Marotta, Managing Director; Paul M. Tai, Director of Artists and Repertory; Lisa Kahlden, Director of Information Technology; Virginia Hayward, Administrative Associate; Mojisola Oké, Bookkeeper; Ben Schmich, Production Associate

RECORDED ANTHOLOGY OF AMERICAN MUSIC, INC., BOARD OF TRUSTEES:
David Hamilton, Treasurer; Milton Babbitt; Emanuel Gerard; Adolph Green; Rita Hauser; Herman E. Krawitz; Arthur Moorhead; Elizabeth Ostrow; Don Roberts; Patrick Smith; Frank Stanton.

Francis Goelet (1926-1998), Chairman

NO PART OF THIS RECORDING MAY BE COPIED OR REPRODUCED WITHOUT WRITTEN PERMISSION OF R.A.A.M., INC.

NEW WORLD RECORDS
16 Penn Plaza #835
NEW YORK, NY 10001-1820
TEL 212.290-1680 FAX 212.290-1685
Website: www.newworldrecords.org
e-mail: info@newworldrecords.org

LINER NOTES © Recorded Anthology of American Music, Inc.